

April 7, 2017

To Whom it may concern

Angie Longacre worked as a free lance writer for Everett Public Schools for two months in fall 2015. Her time with us was brief only because of school district budget issues. As Director of Communications with the district then, I was sorry we were unable to use her talents for a longer period and more campaigns.

Angie's assignment was to interview students and teachers and to craft stories about their use of educational technology to teach and to learn. She willingly attended meetings to gain background and churned out story segments and analogies we used in print and social media.

I was impressed with her quick response, her work ethic and her creativity. School district topics are not always the most fascinating, but she wrote the segments for us in ways that not only demonstrated the need for educational technology, but did so without the bureaucratic language that often hampers public sector communications.

I strongly recommend Angie as a writer with talent, commitment and expansive range.

Sincerely,

Mary Waggoner, APR
Former Director of Communications
Everett Public Schools (now retired)