To Whom It May Concern,

Throughout most of 2016, in a contract role, I served as Northwest Territorial Mint's Executive Director for the Federal Bankruptcy Court trustee handling the mint's Chapter 11 Bankruptcy. On a near daily basis I interacted with Angie Longacre in her position as a key member of the Mint's marketing team. The purpose of this letter is to share with you my impressions of her work, her impact on her team and on the overall company.

Angie Longacre was a full time employee who worked remotely 4 days a week and spent a day a week interacting face to face in the company's headquarters. She consistently outperformed her team mates (who were resident five days a week) on every productivity and quality measure. Clearly she has perfected how to work independently, with tight time lines, with little direction or help. As a writer/editor Angie had to write for different audiences using a variety of formats, styles, technical and non technical idioms, all while maintaining very specific brand standards. Her projects included everything written to any audience in or for the company from very specific product brochures, letters and marketing materials to university and company presidents, to general marketing communication needs of specific salespeople, to editing the company newsletter. Angie is a master of her craft.

Angie was never afraid to ask for more work, to spot opportunities to insert her skills, or to help others on her team succeed. She never hesitated to help anyone who came to her for help or advice on communications and marketing. In transitioning the company to "after Chapter 11 bankruptcy," Angie was the very last remaining person from the marketing department before closure and transfer of the company to out-of-state interests. Sticking it out till the last requires a special grit. She's got it.

I highly recommend Angie Longacre with no reservation for any marketing writer/editor position at any level for which she applies. She is smart, productive, focused, action oriented, team minded and a quick study. Her coworkers and management found her to be open-minded, trusted, independent, highly productive and helpful.
